

Shaping The Funding Framework: Summary Report

1 Executive summary

1. This report examines the nature of the relationship between Auckland Transport, a council-controlled organisation of Auckland Council, and Auckland's 21 local boards with regard to transport decision-making, funding and relationships, with a particular focus on place-making.
2. Place-making is a key part of the role of local boards: local boards have the most potential to add value where place is more significant than movement and local uniqueness is more valuable than regional consistency.
3. There appears to be a variable level of satisfaction amongst local boards with respect to their ability to shape place-making outcomes within the road corridor. Formal delegation of some transport decision making to local boards has been raised as a way to address this issue, but Auckland Transport is concerned about the legal and healthy and safety implications of any delegations that are more than quite minor and low-level. Having local boards making decisions, as governors, over largely operational matters could also be inefficient and is not consistent with their role.
4. The Local Board Transport Capital Fund (TCF) was established in 2012 to provide local boards with more direct ability to influence local transport projects. While we have not been able to systematically analyse the outcomes provided by it, the fund is valued by local board members and has delivered some good initiatives, and some people consider that it should be increased.
5. There are mixed views amongst board members on the quality and purpose of consultation: while some local board members feel there is genuine consultation, others feel that it can be late or tokenistic. There also appear to be different expectations of respective roles in consulting the public, and concerns about a lack of timely, high-quality information, and advice on the TCF.
6. We have considered options to empower local boards' place-shaping role and improve the relationship between local boards and Auckland Transport.

Place-shaping decision making

7. Delegating individual decisions, for example, on street furniture, could result in a series of operational decisions about specific issues being required of local boards, rather than the boards playing a governance role in local place-making. Rather, Auckland Transport should be more responsive to local boards in giving effect to their role as place-makers. Some particular examples include:
  - Auckland Transport taking direction from local boards on the 'look and feel' of changes to the streetscape, including providing options to boards where appropriate
  - Auckland Transport being more responsive to local board place-making initiatives, particularly where 'place' has been prioritised over 'movement'
  - Ensuring local board input into the Roads and Streets Framework is considered as it is a tool to resolve strategic network / place conflicts
